Have you ever heard of world war 2? chances are you have but, what you might not know is that WWII is still affecting the Solomon Islands today. Should these nations be held accountable for something that happened over 70 years ago? While these countries were trying to protect their citizens, their actions had negative effects on the land. This includes the unexploded bombs that still affect people today.

To start off, these countries were just trying to protect their citizens. World war 2 was a huge war that involved many countries and was detrimental to everybody. Huge losses were taken on both sides to prevent wars like this from happening again, and the aftermath is justifiable when avoiding millions of losses. While some may see these losses as a terrible thing (which they are) these left over defenses could stop invasions and save thousands of lives in the future.

To counter that, these bombs that affect people to this day should have been cleaned up a long time ago. Since these bombs are still Present on the island to this day they continue to kill people. What I'm referring to are the unexploded bombs in the Solomon Islands that continue to take lives and affect the soil. These bombs negatively affect crops, and not much assistance is provided to help the Solomon Islands get rid of this issue.

To end with, it is apparent that the Solomon Islands is not being properly equipped with the necessary equipment to tackle this issue. The necessary assistance could be the U.S as well as other countries sending money and people to remove these bombs from the soil. This would prevent more deaths from happening, and families would stop having to worry.

To sum up all this information, while these actions were in place to protect people, they ended up hurting people many years after the war was over. What could be done to help would be assistance given to affected countries. This would stop families from worrying, and ultimately fix the issue. However only time will tell as this issue is still relevant to this day.
