

Police efficiency

JAIR

There are a few differences between the police in the US and in my native country

US police: The police in US is better trained, they also have less roots of corruption

Native Country police: As we all know police in a developing country is not as well trained or paid in comparison to other countries, which later on contributes to persuade police officer to dove into the world of crime to earn that little extra money.

consequently, other police officers may think that risk their lives for a miserable salary is not worth.

Police budget

One of the major issues there are in the US recently is whether or not the police funds should be reduce.

one critical example is the police in Baltimore, which launch a new project that consist on a "spy plane" flying above the city recording video footage for around 11 hours what's imposing about this is the cost. the police over 3 million for this program.

The big issue with this is that some citizens alleged that their constitutional rights are being violated. as illustrated by the following "although there are no indications that BDP(Baltimore police department) has used this program to target particular protester's, it continues to record video of every protester's daytime movements, in violation of their first Amendment rights... That is not a power that the government should have in a democracy" Through this passage we can infer that the only reason for a government to have this type of surveillance system is to threaten and infuse fear into protesters.

What makes this even more controversial is its inefficiency. The project was made with the main goal of using the video data to reduce crime yet it left so much to be desired. This is evident in the following "after more than 700 hours aloft over the city, just one arrest has been made with aid from the program's imagery data, according to BDP" Through this example we learn that this project is not only a failure but a waste of money.
